Dear s22

I was wondering whether you would mind if I did this Masterclass – Mark Evans has offered us a free place (saving $2200). I'm not sure if s22 received the same invitation – if not, I'll check with them if they would like to go too.

What do you think?

Regards

Subject: MasterClass

Dear s22

Professor Mark Evans has asked me to forward the attached Master Class flyer to you – we are running a two day Master Class on Evidence-Based Policy Making – Methods That Matter at the Old Parliament House on Monday 27 March and Tuesday 28 March. This two day program aims at providing participants the opportunity to expand the range and variety of methods used to gather and analyse evidence for policy making.

Mark said that he would be very happy to give a couple of free tickets for this program. If anyone is interested in the free tickets and if more people would like to pay and participate please ask them to email me directly.

All participants will be given a copy of the Institute's new book – Evidence-based policy making in social science: Methods that matter, that covers all the methods and talks about which methods to apply in which contexts.

Book reviews

"This is an important book. University-based researchers, think tank staff, and policy makers, should all read it and follow its suggestions." Citizen's Income Trust

"This valuable book highlights the potential contribution of a wide range of social science research methods to policy making, and outlines suggestions for improving the research input into the policy process." Professor Hugh Bochel, University of Lincoln

"An accessible and informative collection, providing invaluable practical guidance, which highlights the central importance of social science to public policy." Professor Tony Manzi, University of Westminster

"Gerry Stoker and Mark Evans showcase tools through which to generate evidence-based policy insights. Released amidst discussions of a 'post-truth' era, this book is recommended to students looking to broaden their understanding of methods for providing meaningful evidence for policy creation". London School of Economics Review of Books

Content

Social science has an under-appreciated range of other methods covering both quantitative and qualitative analysis. There are new forms of discovery just waiting to be found. We want you to be able to touch base with the latest best practice on the use of Systematic Reviews, Random Controlled Trials, the analysis of Big Data, design thinking, qualitative techniques for comparison using Boolean and fuzzy set logic, citizen science, the use narrative for policy makers and citizens, cluster analysis and microsimulation modelling. Of course some of the methods that we refer to have been on the shelves for a number of decades but we now know better how that to apply the method across a range of policy arenas. Other methods are relatively novel within social science but again they have been selected for attention as we have growing examples of their application in the context of policy making.

Delivery

To launch our two day event we will organise an initial morning session in the form of speed dating tables and you will have a chance to be briefed and ask questions about several methods as you move from table to table with sessions run by academics specialists in the method, accompanied in some case by policymakers who have used the method.

Thereafter in the first day afternoon you will get to explore one method in greater depth according to your interests under the guidance of an expert. The second day starts with a group exercise where you apply the method to a policy question of interest and develop your skills and understanding in an interactive manner. The event then will return in the afternoon session to the vexed issue of how to find the right method to apply to the right policy challenge. Again there will be plenty of time for discussion and debate.

LEARNING OUTCOMES: The goal is that you leave the event wiser about the range of social science methods for gaining evidence with access to resources to enable you to follow up. In addition you will have worked through the application of a particular method suited to your policy challenges. Finally you will have gained a network of contacts within the University and beyond to support your development and future work.

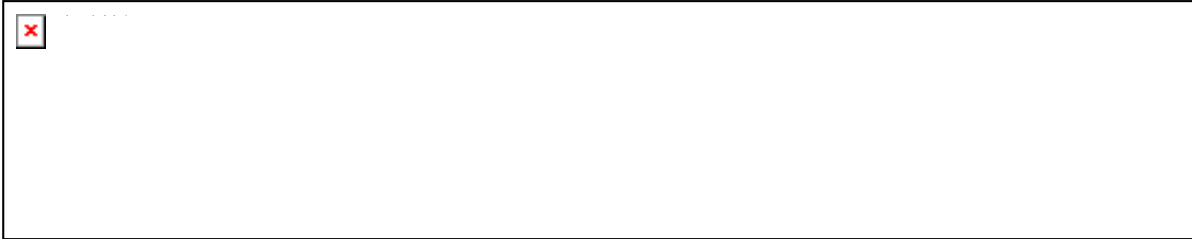

Best wishes
